TEA IN JANE AUSTEN'S BATH

Step into the world of Jane Austen's Bath, where society, indulgence and afternoon tea shaped daily life. In Northanger Abbey, Austen references the famed Sally Lunn buns – already a beloved treat of the city and a familiar comfort to those enjoying Bath's social scene.

Bath was a centre of fashion and refinement, where visitors gathered to promenade, take the waters, and partake in the rituals of tea and conversation. It was within this lively setting that Sally Lunn's buns became a staple – simple in origin, yet rich in flavour and reputation.

During this time, Sally Lunn is believed to have baked her buns in this very house, before selling them on foot around Bath. Only later did the house take her name, by which time her buns had become a true institution, enjoyed by residents and visitors alike.

Today, we continue this tradition, baking fresh every morning using time-honoured methods and the finest ingredients. Our signature buns are served much as they would have been in Austen's day – warm, generous, and best savoured in good company, with a pot of tea and a moment to linger. We hope you enjoy.
